About the OECD

The OECD is an international organisation in which governments compare and exchange policy experiences, identify good practices in light of emerging challenges, and promote decisions and recommendation to produce better policies for better lives. The OECD’s mission is to promote policies that improve economic and social well-being of people around the world.

About the Greece-OECD Project

The Greek government is prioritising the fight against corruption and bribery and, with the assistance of the European institutions, is committed to taking immediate action. Under the responsibility of the General Secretariat against Corruption, Greece’s National Anti-Corruption Action Plan (NACAP) identifies key areas of reform and provides for a detailed action plan towards strengthening integrity and fighting corruption and bribery. The OECD, together with Greece and the European Commission, has developed support activities for implementing the NACAP. This project is carried out with funding by the European Union and Greece.

Introduction

Greece’s National Anti-Corruption Action Plan (NACAP) identifies key areas of reform and provides for a detailed action plan towards strengthening integrity and fighting corruption and bribery. Through its Greece Technical Assistance Project, the OECD has committed to supporting the Greek authorities and to provide technical guidance to implement the reform agenda in a series of pre-identified areas.

This document has been produced under Outcome 3.4 of the Technical Assistance Project which aims to promote co-ordination, co-operation and information-sharing among authorities involved in detecting, investigating and prosecuting corruption as well as bribery. The document starts by describing the law enforcement framework in corruption cases. It explains the relevant authorities involved and the existing co-ordination and information exchange among these authorities. The document then proposes measures and tools for enhancing co-ordination, reporting of allegations, information-sharing, and prioritising cases. Information for the document was drawn from the Hellenic authorities’ responses to questionnaires in January 2017; consultation meetings with these authorities in Thessaloniki and Athens in February 2017; and a workshop on law enforcement co-ordination in Athens on 4-8 December 2017. The proposals identify the outlines and general principles for better co-ordination in Greece; details for implementation such as specific legal agreements or instruments for a co-ordination mechanism will have to be developed at a later time.

I. General framework for criminal proceedings in corruption cases

There is no single entry point for corruption or other economic crime allegations in Greece. A large number of authorities and administrative bodies may receive such allegations due to their varied nature and responsibilities.1 These bodies’ officials, like all Greek public officials, must report to the Public Prosecutor offences of which they become aware during the exercise of their duties (Article 37 Code of Penal Procedure (CPP)).

A Public Prosecutor who becomes aware of information about a crime must initiate a prosecution unless the complaint is legally or manifestly unfounded in substance, or is insusceptible of judicial control (Arts. 27 and 43 CPP). Since the majority of corruption-related crimes in Greece are felonies,2 the Public Prosecutor must first order a preparatory examination (προκαταρκτική εξέταση) or preliminary investigation (προανάκριση) (Article 43 CPP). Preparatory examinations and preliminary investigations are performed by general or special investigative officers defined in Arts. 33 and 34 CPP under the supervision of the Public Prosecutor. If the preparatory examination or preliminary investigation does not yield sufficient evidence, then the Public Prosecutor asks the Judicial Council to dismiss the case. Otherwise, s/he requests the commencement of prosecution either by sending the accused to trial (for misdemeanours) or by ordering a main investigation conducted by an investigative judge (for felonies) (Article 245 CPP). An indictment may then be issued if the main investigation produces sufficient evidence (Article 308 CPP).

These tasks are usually performed by Public Prosecutors of the Court of First Instance and general investigative judges, but there are exceptions. In cases to which Law 4022/2011 applies, the Public Prosecutors against Crimes of Corruption (PPACC) in Athens and Thessaloniki are responsible for ordering preparatory examinations and preliminary investigations. The main investigation is conducted by the President of the Court of First Instance (Investigative Judges of Law 4022/2011). Furthermore, Article 17A(3) of Law 2523/1997 vests the Economic Crime Prosecutor (ECP) with jurisdiction over all financial, economic and tax related crimes in Greece. The current practice, however, is for the ECP to assert jurisdiction only over criminal tax cases.

As discussed further in a separate deliverable, one issue under this arrangement is that the PPACC conducts much more than complex corruption cases. Law 4022/2011 broadly applies to felonies occurring in Athens or Thessaloniki that fall under the subject matter jurisdiction of the three member Court of Appeals. These offences include not only bribery and theft against the state but also felonies against property, national currency, adulteration, fraud, etc. The Law applies not only to certain senior public officials (political functionaries and civil servants) who commit these offences, but also to individuals who have been legally entrusted, even temporarily, directly or indirectly, with the exercise of a public or municipal service. This includes also employees of banks residing in Greece. The Law further applies to any individual – including non-public officials – who commit these offences if the Public Prosecutor of the Supreme Court (Areios Pagos) considers the case to be of high social or public interest.

II. Lack of co-ordination and exchange of information in corruption cases

During the consultations with investigators, prosecutors and investigative judges, the OECD team heard examples of parallel investigations in corruption cases under the current arrangement. Duplication occurs at three levels: (i) between the PPACC and the ECP, (ii) between the PPACC and Prosecutors of the Court of First Instance, and (iii) among Prosecutors of the Court of First Instance and investigative authorities such as police units or SDOE:

(i) The PPACC and ECP have conducted parallel investigations in the past. Indeed, there have been examples where the PPACC’s investigation of a company for bribing Greek public officials has led the ECP to launch its own investigation against the company’s executives for tax offences. The ECP has also decided that it should investigate Greek officials who face corruption allegations for failure to declare the proceeds of corruption under tax laws. This means that almost every PPACC corruption case may potentially lead to a concurrent tax investigation by the ECP. In these concurrent investigations, the PPACC and ECP undoubtedly act within their jurisdictions and investigate different offences (corruption vs. tax). It is equally clear, however, the parallel investigations target the same entities and some of the same evidence, e.g. banking and financial transaction information of those involved.

(ii) Parallel investigations by the PPACC and Prosecutors of the Court of First Instance arise because of the unclear jurisdictional rules in Law 4022/2011. The Law takes certain cases away from the Court of First Instance Prosecutor and assigns them to the PPACC. In practice, the PPACC reassigns some of its cases back to the First Instance Prosecutor because of workload. This has led the First Instance Prosecutor to take the initiative to retain some cases that fall under the PPACC’s jurisdiction under Law 4022/2011 but without informing the PPACC. When the PPACC opens its own inquiry into these cases, parallel investigation may result. In addition, the Supreme Court Prosecutor can assign a case of high social or public interest to the PPACC. The First Instance Prosecutor may not be aware of the decision and may open a parallel investigation.

(iii) Parallel investigations may also arise among different Prosecutors of the Court of First Instance, or different investigative authorities such as police units or SDOE. As mentioned above, there is no single entry point for corruption or other economic crime allegations. When more than one authority or administrative body receives allegations about the same case, these authorities could each open their own investigations. Alternatively, they may report the matter to different Prosecutors of the First Instance Court who then open parallel investigations.

\[\text{Output 4.3-4.4: Technical Proposals and Reference Materials for Building Capacity and Mobilisation of Greek Law Enforcement Authorities, Section 2.}\]
These parallel investigations, without proper co-ordination, need to be avoided for several reasons:

- Resources are wasted, e.g. the same evidence is sought and analysed more than once. This is especially damaging since all stakeholders agree that Greek prosecutors face a severe shortage of resources.

- Cases are not prioritised. A very important case may be investigated by just one prosecutor and his/her experts and investigators. A relatively unimportant case might be investigated by the PPACC, ECP, and one or more Prosecutors of the First Instance Court, and their investigative teams.

- Investigations can be jeopardised. Steps taken in one investigation can tip off an investigative target and jeopardise the second investigation.

- Information is not fully leveraged. One prosecutor may have helpful information about the case that a second prosecutor does not have, and vice versa. But the information in their possession is not combined for full advantage.

III. OECD proposals in other relevant project outputs

Two of the OECD’s proposals under other project outputs help reduce parallel investigations and improve prioritisation of corruption cases.

A first proposal advocates a uniform threshold and channel for the authorities and administrative bodies to refer corruption allegations to prosecutors.4 If implemented, the proposal would improve case prioritisation by filtering out weak allegations. Training and guidance would help authorities and administrative bodies identify the proper prosecutorial authority for receiving allegations. This would then lessen the likelihood that multiple prosecutorial authorities receive allegations about the same case and open parallel investigations.

A second proposal concerns the jurisdiction of the PPACC.5 Among other things, the proposal would limit the PPACC’s jurisdiction to corruption felonies (and related crimes such as money laundering) committed by senior officials (political functionaries and civil servants) anywhere in Greece. The PPACC could also investigate and prosecute corruption felonies that s/he, and not the Public Prosecutor of the Supreme Court, considers to be of major public or social interest. If implemented, the proposal would improve case prioritisation by giving the PPACC jurisdiction over the most serious corruption matters, and by allowing the PPACC to prioritise cases within his/her jurisdiction. The proposal would also reduce the likelihood of parallel investigations by more clearly delimiting the PPACC’s jurisdiction.

These two proposals are not enough as they only partially resolve the current problems with co-ordination and parallel investigations. Additional proposals dealing specifically with co-ordination are necessary.

IV. Additional proposals to streamline co-operation, co-ordination and information-sharing

The additional proposals consist of two levels (i) co-ordination between the PPACC and the ECP; (ii) co-ordination between the PPACC and the Public Prosecutors of the Court of First Instance.

proposals concern cases that are conducted by the PPACC. As discussed above, the offences in these cases include not only corruption felonies but also related offences such as money laundering and tax crimes. The proposal focuses on these cases because they are the most important, serious and sensitive. Successful co-ordination of these cases will have the most impact.

A secondary proposal tries to tackle issues of co-ordination (iii) among Prosecutors of the Court of First Instance and investigative authorities such as police units or SDOE. This proposal concerns low-level corruption cases, or economic crimes unrelated to corruption by public officials, such as private sector embezzlement or fraud. These cases are extremely numerous and spread throughout the country.

V. Co-ordination between the PPACC and the ECP

The proposal to streamline co-operation, co-ordination and information-sharing between the PPACC and the ECP draws on existing practice. These arrangements could, however, be better structured and formalised.

During the consultations with the OECD team, it became evident that communication and co-ordination between the current Athens PPACC, who has been in office since May 2017, and the ECP takes place on an informal and interpersonal basis as needed. Formalisation of this practice would ensure its continuation with future PPACCs and ECPs. This could be done through a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) or any other formal arrangement that the prosecutors deem appropriate as long as it allows for adequate co-ordination. Whatever the formal arrangement, the two prosecutors would meet on a regular basis (e.g. every month). The same model could be duplicated in Thessaloniki for the PPACC and the Deputy ECP who are based there. This arrangement takes into account the underlying principle of the secrecy of pre-trial investigations; information is shared only between two senior prosecutors who are potentially dealing with the same case and only as necessary for co-ordination. In almost all cases, the PPACC and ECP will agree on how to co-ordinate in specific cases. This has been the experience under the current informal and interpersonal arrangement between these two prosecutors. Prosecutors in other jurisdictions with a similar co-ordination arrangement report the same experience. When necessary and appropriate, the PPACC and the ECP could invite the Deputy Prosecutor of the Supreme Court to resolve any issues on an ad hoc basis. The PPACC and ECP may also invite other prosecutors or heads of law enforcement authorities on an ad hoc basis when relevant issues arise. The ad hoc involvement of these additional stakeholders avoids unnecessary bureaucratic structures, thereby reducing resource consumption and making co-ordination meetings easier to organise.

This arrangement would allow the two prosecutors to monitor closely the progress in ongoing investigations, make the best use of available resources by eliminating potential overlaps, and facilitate mutual exchange of information. It would also allow them to prioritise cases that they consider of major public or social interest and merit speedy proceedings. Finally, given that corruption cases very often have a tax element, the ECP would benefit from this arrangement in obtaining new leads and information for tax investigations. A list of cases that are of common interest could be established between the PPACC and the ECP for the purposes of the co-ordination meetings.

Second, it is proposed that the same Public Prosecutor of the Supreme Court supervises the offices of the PPACC and the ECP. This already occurs in practice. Law 4022/2011 Article 2(1)(a) stipulates that the work of PPACC is supervised and co-ordinated by a Deputy Prosecutor of the Supreme Court. The same provision has been included in Article 17A(2) of Law 2523/1997 regarding the ECP. Although not

6 Please also refer to the Output 4.3-4.4: Technical Proposals and Reference Materials for Building Capacity and Mobilisation of Greek Law Enforcement Authorities, Chapter 6: Expanding Access to Databases.
7 The proposal reflects the concerns expressed by the PPACC and the ECP about confidentiality and unwieldiness if too many authorities participate in the co-ordination arrangement. To this end, we consider appropriate to limit the proposal only for the PPACC and the ECP.
required by law, the same Deputy Prosecutor of the Supreme Court currently supervises the work of both prosecutorial offices. Codification of this arrangement would take into account the principle of indivisibility and vertical organisation of the prosecutorial system. It could be achieved by a circular, or by amending Article 17A(2) of Law 2523/1997 and Article 2(1)(a) of Law 4022/2011. In the unlikely event that the PPACC and ECP cannot agree on the co-ordination in a particular case through co-ordination meetings described above, the Supreme Court Prosecutor could then step in to resolve the matter.

VI. Co-ordination between the PPACC and the Public Prosecutors of the Court of First Instance

Even if Greece decides to limit the PPACC’s jurisdiction to corruption felonies (and related crimes such as money laundering) committed by senior officials (political functionaries and civil servants), practice suggests that it would be extremely difficult to ensure that only the PPACC would deal with the cases of Law 4022/2011.

This means that the PPACC should be at least informed when a certain 4022/2011 case is being investigated by the First Instance Prosecution Office in Athens and Thessaloniki. During consultations in December 2018, the Athens PPACC suggested that the Heads of the above First Instance Prosecution Offices send regularly (e.g. every month) a list of corruption cases that their offices handle. The PPACC would then check the list for overlaps in investigations, or for investigations that need to be transferred to the PPACC office. To protect the secrecy of pre-trial investigations, the PPACC would maintain confidentiality of the list and use it only for co-ordination purposes. This arrangement would also foster mutual trust between the PPACC and the Heads of the Prosecution Office of the Court of First Instance as they would not see each other antagonistically but as serving the common objectives, i.e. to join forces in the fight against corruption.

VII. Co-ordination between different First Instance Prosecutors and/or investigative authorities

As already described above, low-level corruption cases, or economic crimes unrelated to corruption by public officials, such as private sector embezzlement or fraud, are extremely numerous and spread throughout the country. Co-ordination of these cases would demand different solutions such as a case management database and regional anti-corruption prosecutors. These solutions would require additional resources and Greece could therefore consider them at a later stage.

Database for investigations

For example, Greece could consider establishing an extensive and nationwide database of investigations in open cases. If properly organised, the database of investigations could be a very effective tool not only in terms of co-operation, co-ordination and information-sharing but also in terms of prevention and detection. The United Kingdom has long experience in this area, and Slovenia has recently undertaken the initiative to establish a similar database. Greece could therefore look at their models and consult with their authorities in the process of setting up a database for investigations.

The present report outlines some basic principles for such a database to function in Greece. To protect the secrecy of pre-trial investigations, the data of the database and their transmission are encrypted. All data should have an owner who is able to control who has access to this set of data, for which purposes and at what level. Each access to the data should be recorded to allow the owner of the data to identify those who have accessed the data. Finally, the database should abide by protection of personal data 8 It has to be noted that all investigation authorities (“Participants in Tackling Foreign Bribery”) have access to UK’s Foreign Bribery Register. On the other hand, Slovenia’s register of cases give access only to prosecutorial authorities.

regulations. This means in practice that the data of the database are accurate, adequate, relevant and not excessive in relation to the purposes for which they are collected, processed fairly and lawfully, and collected for specified, explicit and legitimate purposes and not be used for incompatible or unrelated purposes.

Regional anti-corruption prosecutors

Greece could consider establishing regional anti-corruption prosecutors in the Prosecution Offices of the Courts of First Instance or Courts of Appeal. The Thessaloniki PPACC supported this idea during the December 2017 consultations. This proposal could be implemented either if Greece accepts the proposal to expand the jurisdiction of the PPACC nationwide9 or if it retains the current division of the jurisdiction of the PPACC only between Athens and Thessaloniki. Having regional anti-corruption prosecutors in every Court of First Instance or Court of Appeal would ensure that the investigative authorities and administrative bodies would refer corruption allegations only to the said anti-corruption prosecutors minimising the chance of having parallel investigations among different prosecutors, or different investigative authorities. Moreover, since only anti-corruption prosecutors would deal with corruption cases (either cases of 4022/2011 or low-level corruption case) it would be easier for the anti-corruption prosecutors to supervise and direct the investigative authorities in a more efficient way.

Conclusion

A lack of co-ordination in corruption cases is a common problem in Greece. The result is a waste of precious resources, poor prioritisation of cases, and investigations of lesser quality. The proposals in this document and other Project deliverables should significantly improve the co-ordination of complex corruption cases conducted by the PPACC. The Greek authorities are strongly urged to implement these proposals. The proposed arrangement could also be reviewed and fine-tuned after 12 months for improvement. Efforts to co-ordinate low-level corruption cases could be pursued at a later phase when resources become available.
