

Wikigender University

Wikigender

Launched by the OECD Development Centre on 8 March 2008, www.wikigender.org is an interactive online tool that covers a broad range of gender issues, while also focusing on statistics and measurements. The site belongs to the gender community. Anyone can join and take an active part in the project.

Wikigender has more than 1, 100 articles maintained by over 1000 users coming from about 170 countries. Regularly updating and adding to the information available on Wikigender is critical to its success and relevance.

While much of this work is done by our community of users, the OECD Development Centre has also established a programme with Paris-based universities that engages students in adding articles, doing outreach and benefitting from the networking opportunities provided by Wikigender.

Wikigender University

Given the success of the current programme, we would like to expand it to selected universities, in both developed and developing countries, to enhance the range of perspectives and information that is available on the website.

Wikigender University aims to:

- actively engage students in the development of this gender equality platform
- bring together a range of universities to foster networking possibilities among students and academics, thereby extending the network of Wikigender users
- enhance opportunities for building capacity in gender research, information sharing, social networking, IT and editorial skills.

How to get involved?

You can become involved with Wikigender University in several ways, from bringing Wikigender editing into one of your gender-related courses at the university, to starting a group project on a specific theme (ie Women and Climate Change) with Wikigender, and more. In return, Wikigender University can help increase the visibility of your academic courses and help your students learn about gender issues, connect with others working in this field and develop links between universities and research institutes.

If you are interested in becoming part of the Wikigender University project, or if you would like to know more, please email us at: contact@wikigender.org. We are open to your suggestions and ideas!
