After short periods in industry and the UK National Health Service, Julian Edwards joined the UK Consumers Associations in 1974 as a researcher and writer for WHICH? Magazine. He was the Deputy Editor of WHICH? for three years and then held several posts managing CA's extensive research programme, including product testing and reporting. During this period he was closely involved in the development of collaborative international research with a consortium of European consumer organisations.

In 1991, Julian Edwards was seconded for a year to Consumers International as its Director General and then spent four years as an independent consumer policy consultant, working mostly with UK public services. He returned to Consumers International in January, 1996.
