This paper reviews some of the issues related to statistical quality of the Human Development Index (HDI) and other indices and indicators regularly published in the Human Development Report (HDR) of UNDP. We examine the HDI and its component indices within a typical statistical quality framework, addressing issues related to its relevance, consistency, accuracy and robustness, timelines, comparability and methodological soundness. A special attention is paid to data availability.