

Adarsh Varma

Adarsh is an economist with 14 years public and private sector experience in low carbon transition, green jobs, climate finance and environmental economics. He has previously worked for Ricardo-AEA, ICF Consulting and the Greater London Authority. Adarsh has advised a wide range of clients on economic impacts of low carbon pathways, including the World Bank, German Development Authority (GIZ), Asia Development Bank, European Commission, International Labour Organisation (ILO) and various national planning and environment ministries. He has authored a book published by the ILO on assessing green jobs in developing countries. In his previous role for the Mayor of London, he analysed the economic impacts of London's congestion charge and developed a model to measure environmental and social impact of London's population and employment growth.
